

45,000 acres

restored or protected for pollinators, 245,000 total acres since 2008

4,700 individuals

pledged to install or protect 59,000 acres through our Bring Back the Pollinators Pledge

11,000 participants

engaged in trainings and workshops, 62,000 since 2008

200 species

have been monitored through status assessment and surveys over the past six years.

25 states will include imperiled bumble bees, 42 states will include dragonflies, and 10 states will include freshwater mussels in their lists of Species of Greatest Conservation Need based upon input from Xerces.

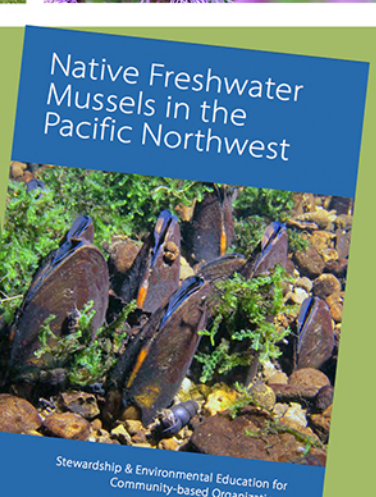

The Xerces Society continues to make meaningful contributions to protecting invertebrates including restoring and protecting habitat, conducting the science necessary to inform policy and conservation practices, providing educational tools and resources, and engaging individuals in invertebrate conservation at all levels.

Publications

The Xerces Society continues to produce publications and resource materials in support of invertebrate conservation. In 2015 we continued to expand upon our focus on roadsides as opportunities for pollinator habitat, and published several ground breaking conservation guides and scientific reports.
